Project Description:

Hydrogen powered gas turbine engine has been a topic of active research and is certainly an attractive option due to reduction in carbon footprint. However, the specific fuel energy of H<sub>2</sub> poses additional challenges in the thermal management aspects of components downstream of the combustors, due to gas temperatures reaching 2000K when compared to a conventional gas turbine. The current project aims at addressing the thermal management challenges through using secondary coolants such as super critical CO<sub>2</sub> (sCO<sub>2</sub>) at a select location of the gas turbines and advancing heat exchangers for oil cooling and fuel preheating leveraging advanced manufacturing options.

In addition to gas turbine applications, sCO<sub>2</sub> is also being considered as a working fluid for next generation heat pumps and refrigeration systems. One of the first sCO<sub>2</sub> based heat pump facility working in transcritical mode has been installed at IITM in collaboration with NTNU, Norway. Further studies and developments are planned to improve heat exchangers and system design to translate sCO<sub>2</sub> based heatpumps into the Indian industry.

Immediate goals:

- 1.) Establishment of state-of-the-art of testing facility that is suitable for handling sCO<sub>2</sub> as a secondary fluid while primary could be other liquids such as Oil. The test facility needs to be modular and scalable.
- 2.) Development of mathematical models to predict heat-transfer performance of heat exchangers with sCO<sub>2</sub> as the working fluid
